Hotel Fort Gatlin (ca. 1926-1965)

In the mid-1920s, Orlando's building boom gave rise to the Hotel Fort Gatlin on Orange Avenue where guests could relax and enjoy a "Full Course Golden Fried Chicken Dinner." The dining room served fresh Florida fruits and vegetables and meats of the highest quality, prepared by well-trained chefs. The building was bought and subsequently demolished in 1965 by the Orlando Sentinel newspaper which chose to expand its operations on the site.

Latchstring Tearoom (ca. 1930s-1950s)

Between the 1930s and 1950s, the corner of Magnolia Ave. and Colonial Dr. was home to artist and horticulturist Mulford Foster. Here he opened the Tropical Arts Nursery and the Latchstring Tearoom. One could enjoy sipping a cup of tea while looking out at some of the 200 species of plants, including bromeliads, discovered by Foster on his travels around the world. In fact, colonies of Foster's bromeliads can still be found in the historic neighborhoods around Orlando. A 7-Eleven has replaced the lush environment that once dominated this corner near Lake Eola Heights, but memories of the nursery and tearoom live on in the minds of longtime Orlando residents.

Gary's Duck Inn (1945-1994)

Opening its doors in 1945 on South Orange Blossom Trail, Gary's catered to Orlando's growing population and tourists with no-frills seafood that featured quality, service, and affordable prices. The restaurant's popularity drew celebrities like Dolly Parton and Bob Hope to dine on their Jumbo Shrimp. It is estimated that Gary's served about 25,000 pounds of shrimp annually during the 1970s and 1980s, its heyday. The success of Gary's interested Bill Darden of Darden Restaurants, Inc. to become a co-owner of the local landmark in 1963 and became the inspiration for a chain of seafood restaurants, known today as Red Lobster. Although Gary's closed in 1994, its legacy continues to grow in the U.S. and abroad.

Ronnie's Restaurant (1956-1995)

For 39 years, Ronnie's Restaurant, located at Bumby and East Colonial, served good food with abrupt service to a wide mix of people, from locals to campaigning politicians like Bob Dole. Owner Larry Beckart used his keen business sense and sharp wit to become a local celebrity. Despite strict enforcement of rules such as no food sharing, rationed butter, and no dividing checks, "customers would line up for hours" to enjoy pastrami sandwiches, blintzes, and fresh bagels. Ronnie's closed its doors in 1995, but will continue to be remembered as an Orlando landmark.

Lee's Lakeside (ca. 1980-2005)

Once one of the top choices for locals to celebrate a special occasion, Lee's Lakeside stood as a centerpiece of downtown Orlando for 20 years. Its owner, Lee Rose, purchased the building formerly known as the Cherry Plaza Hotel in the 1980s and renovated the property to take full advantage of the panoramic view of Lake Eola and the Orlando city skyline. Lee's Lakeside became a favorite dining destination for Central Floridians and visiting dignitaries, including Governor Lawton Chiles. Linda Chapin, former Orange County chairman, commented that "[Miss Lee] made it fashionable to come downtown for a meal" offering signature items such as Pina Colada Muffins, Red Snapper Amandine, and Tournedos Lakeside. Sadly, Lee's Lakeside closed in 2005 following 3 tough years after the death of Lee Rose. Recently, Robin Stotter, a former apprentice of famed chef Wolfgang Puck, purchased the former Lee's Lakeside and plans to rejuvenate the location with his own "imaginative cuisine."
