The Scattered Brain Convalesces

2014

Sam Lamura
University of Central Florida

Find similar works at: https://stars.library.ucf.edu/honortheses1990-2015

University of Central Florida Libraries http://library.ucf.edu

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

https://stars.library.ucf.edu/honortheses1990-2015/1587

This Open Access is brought to you for free and open access by STARS. It has been accepted for inclusion in HIM 1990-2015 by an authorized administrator of STARS. For more information, please contact lee.dotson@ucf.edu.
The Scattered Brain Convalesces

by

Sam Eliot LaMura

A thesis submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Creative Writing in the College of Arts and Humanities and in the Burnett Honors College at the University of Central Florida Orlando, Florida

Spring Term 2014

Thesis Chair: Terry Ann Thaxton, MFA
The intent for each poem in this thesis: To write without intent. I, ironically, intended to approach the writing process without considering the outcome of each poem. Some of the poems spiraled out of control, while others spiraled into focus. I do not always know what I’m thinking. It may be unfair to impose clarity on poems when clarity is not always part of experience. Each poem took self-examination to understand in the context of my own life. The proposal for this thesis, entitled, “The Unintended Approach,” did not mention the unintended consequences of writing poems in such a way. Bursts of energy found their way into the writing. Only in reflection, did I realize that these bursts of energy were understandable in the context of personal memory.

This experiment in crafting poems, at times, left me confused. There are images I still can’t seem to decipher. I have kept my belief that concise meaning in poetry is not the most important aspect of verse. With rapid urbanization, increased distortion created by fast-paced leaps in technology, and the evolution of celebrity awareness, the world we write in, is not the world we were written into. I have written each poem into their own place on page—allowed them their own discoveries without my approval. People behave in a way that is often erratic. My experience is intrinsic to what I have observed in my life; a schizophrenic cousin, a slurred maternal mouthing, uncles addicted to drugs or hope, for fame. My life has been a series of disjointed events. This thesis is a composite, not a copy. Genetic code is also a composite. Each poem has a life unlike my own. The goal of this collection was to allow these poems their own struggle to understand.
Dedication

For the one who snapped his belt to strike the air with pressure.
   For the one whose name fell from summer.

      For you, in all those photographs.
      For you, in all those photographs.

      For you, who taught me how to place these letters.

      For you, with the engraved name.

For every strand of twisted helix that carried me here.
Acknowledgements

These poems are the result of memory. There are many people who will not flee from a place so rooted in the cables of synapse. Terry Thaxton gave time and warm-hearted welcome to work that left others, myself sometimes, shivering in doubt. Her drive has inspired me to renew my poetic license. Travis Kiger used pliers to pull a frog from my throat. I was afraid of the pliers. I was afraid of my voice. There were many people. Each name has been a gift.
Table of Contents

La Mura, The Wall ...................................................................................................................... 1

Yukon Gold ..................................................................................................................................... 3

Morality .......................................................................................................................................... 4

Absently Minding the Ghost .......................................................................................................... 5

What Hunger Causes ....................................................................................................................... 6 post[maternal] feb. 8, 2005 ........................................................................................................... 7

The Meal ......................................................................................................................................... 8

Woody Allen is Afraid to Die .......................................................................................................... 10

Where We Place Our Prayers .......................................................................................................... 11

Jerusalem’s faith .............................................................................................................................. 12

He Calls Her Dead-Weight ............................................................................................................. 13

Zombie References “God is Dead” to Justify Existence ............................................................... 14

The Amalgam Attempting to Speak for the First Time .................................................................... 15

The Scatter Brain’s Convalescence ................................................................................................ 17

Now .................................................................................................................................................. 19

The Anti-Apotheosis ....................................................................................................................... 20

Disbelief ......................................................................................................................................... 21

Reading List .................................................................................................................................. 22
La Mura, The Wall

there was a war in which a king, carried by my name, swallowed fists of snow and told men with frost-limbed uniform what they would face the wind and its silk slur, a demon coughing the souls of many others shivering also in their bodies the fruits of the soil and the blood that will feed the roots we are that which falls upwards he may have said even then not knowing he meant heaven we must swallow our swords, we must bury the promise of home not knowing if they would return, not knowing again that home meant heaven we are the coffin splintered and hot iron smoldered we are a memory that will stand like a wall because we are forever stapled into those who succeed us we are the apotheosis, the godsend grown to god, the fear instilled then spilt like refuse in our gutters he may have said this name did not end tragically in a fight or a white field stained this name remembers how some have held it like a child in homes too small and dry to cook with fire this name has been cradled by walls or rather saved them from falling this name did not forget itself, it did not shake like a dog in the rain it is brick and mortar, concrete spilled through a funnel mud and shit dried in the sun, a thousand protesters arms interlocked, it is stucco homes in suburban neighborhoods it is many dead men in a pile, royal crown gold and royal crown red hovering like fog in San Francisco and just as fast and just as thick it became a father who was beaten by another father became a father who left home when he was doused in gasoline, it became a mother who died too young and every person saw the opened casket crushed meaning to swallow all it can, so long as it can still swallow meaning to speak itself over, to iterate the way it has withstood the erosion of movement, it sinks into pockets like smooth stones rolled from the river each tooth and lip that holds it back and also those that loose it once built by a king given to a soldier given to each that came after it is laminated and static in the folds of my wallet, bulging with the footstep of five-hundred years marching Yukon Gold

I peel each potato and apologize for being so brutal. I say sorry for stripping the skin. I imagine there will be bones beneath as if the film of flesh is a sheet of dirt above a body placed in a hole long ago.

I dice the wet globes, pale as if in shock and sweep the contents of the cutting board into a pot of boiling salt-water. My face fogs with steam and I wait for the oblong cubes to soften. I strain it all. Mash it with two full sticks of butter like my mother taught me when I was six. There is too much to eat and I knew this before I started. I apologize for my violence while the ghost of her fingers grips the back of my fists as I work.

Morality

Dogs chased me into a neon bush where hands and thorns left ribbons of cells on my clothing. I am not collapsing like a prisoner.
I am holding out for my future, full of heavy heave and new phase. A killer by association, blue eye(s) in the knot of my neck tie. Diablo sucking face in my near-sightedness and flagrant myopia. Pictures of bodies with holes are tagged with my teeth. I am full of saline ebullience.

At the end of a spotlight I placed my alabaster palm and watched the light collide with flaked skin, my fortune in the lines. I remember a scream unfolding into a face I’m still afraid of. My childhood home has settled in my bones and like a sturgeon, I harden. Like a dream, I fade and cause confusion. These signals in my head are pictures of the people I’ve wounded, their names on my tongue like sawdust. My own name, a glitter tick. A trembling handshake. A façade or a front. My swagger. you settle over me like a wool blanket

I scratch until blister until crater
the jaw-clench leaves me toothless a mouthful of sand sometimes you are oscillating a still bark into the pillow

I am beside the same pillow swallowing all sound and sand until I am

inside rugged my organs the callous the gulps they take to enter your still born growth

water meets faucet moths find glowing bulb

I am some statue with liquid eyes standing guard above a yoga mat

you exhale for the dead-line in the cavern voice of your father

A constellation falls from its proper place, collapses in the mind of Jupiter, lightning crushes a skull, tick chicken, snapped bones with the marrow sucked out. America with stained lips, grinning. Florida tries to pull herself off the mainland, drifting into the Atlantic. We beat each other with blunt objects and fall forward into prisons where penance is expected but never given. Prisons revolve until each prisoner reeks of freedom. Makes the jailbird's skin crawl. My limb departs like a parent. My skin un hinges like breakdown. I am six and stealing pencils to build fires for the lead poison bloom. I am crossing over the border where lockers hum and dogs explode. A scissor cuts a sound from the air, like a chunk of flesh, it is cooked in a skillet until the pitch is golden and crispy. On a plate the sound is not thunder. On a table the sound is crashing into the porcelain beneath it, cracking the heirloom, ruining the dinner, bleeding into the cloth an orange stain.
post[maternal]
feb. 8, 2005

i haven’t seen the box but it’s born a tempest.

my eyes swell with storm & cigarette

ashed & failed heart.
my apartment is a box my head is a box, for every fleeting soul I feel misguided skin & red-lipped promises.

she promised the pills away & they listened.

my ear to the wall, a shiver.
The Meal

I want to be a bastard bomber that sets the bastard bomb adrift.
I want tiny flakes of gold to move through water where the tips of fingers touch, reach up to a tongue and release.
I want feather-light to lift me the way mold spreads across hunger.
It’s tension, knotted wind or a kink in movement from home to hallelujah. All the people sing it, some with glass eyes spinning in their caves, a god’s way of saying, eat the meal. Eat the plates and the glasses and the silverware. Eat the table. Eat the chairs.

When there is nowhere left to sit swallow space swallow void swallow swallow.

Blood moves with you and through you swirling in the melt of things, in the stringy tendons that make us move.

I want a ghost in the attic to keep its ghost-mouth shut. I don’t want wisps of words slipping through the ceiling.

I don’t want the pain of being pure at heart.
I have no heart I can see without radiation.

I am pure like a home. I am cell-struck. Each one rattles like an iron knee. Each knee built with six-fingered hands held in the heat.

I am sun-blistered, mouth open and full of empty light, pulling at the parts of myself that swing out like a child or the legs of fish when they tried to bury themselves in mud, when the mud was made a mix of water and old stone stunned to bits by time.

This, I know, to be the start of something. Not fear but it feels like dense iron and steel.
Taste the powder of it in a pool below an electric saw.

You can promise away a kidney and be proud. You can sink into the floor of a casino and grip a coin tight to your chest.
You can hurry for the bottom with pale-blood that blurs every wall until you’re drunk and confused by the word sanctuary. Until a new language leaves you shocked stiff among the boulders.

I want pistons to push me forward into this beginning.

This beginning may be difficult to see through the window.

This beginning is starved, so a god says eat the meal if any is left.
Woody Allen is Afraid to Die

I.
Everything is black ink dripping like a finger-tap from our gutter-mouths.

II.
Everything is birdcall and tapas, mother Gosling and ugly Ducts.

III.
Everything wants to bite at the feet of seniors as they’re wheeled from the plane.

IV.
Everything makes us cheat on lovers while they ice their lips with frost and froth.

V.
Everything created a boy with more grit than granted. Forgive him for following through, he only meant to break his knuckles.

VI.
You did not cause Everything. Everything causd you, and this thinking—you know that after Everything, Something new will give to sparks. Oh, dear Casablanca.

Oh, a deer. A stag. A stiff-antlered face on the wall. Play it again, Sam—I’m trying to talk to myself.

The coffin wheeled to the mausoleum after the ceremony. The dirt from my hands delivered for her from the shore of the Dead Sea. This is holy, says the rabbi when he fills my empty hands like coin to a beggar. His fingers like arrows point east as he says the word Israel, the words Promised Land and Zion where prayers are pressed into the receding mortar of the Western Wall, pockmarked with the touch of humbled hands. The wall here is smooth, I may only bury my prayers in a palm, into the dirt packaged and sent to spread on her casket, to bring the Promised Land to her grave—a hole in the wall.

I imagine the Voice of Israel, across the water, in warped circles on the surface of the Salty Dead. This isn’t a burial even though earth is in her tomb, so I’ll wait for her ghost to return from the mausoleum, west from either wall, nearly new.
Jerusalem’s faith

is the sound of a shofar carried back across the Nile
    in a paper basket
He Calls Her Dead-Weight

Jessica says she misses me before she breaks a hollow egg-shell over my head. She is skinny noise, the popping hum of cinema film-strip.
Jessica is hungry. Her mouth is reanimated dead-weight. There are no stars, only pinpricks of needle-light from the neon pen she stuck firmly in the wall.
When she tells me she loves me I say thank you, drive my car around and park it in a fist.
Jessica wants to be cocaine-happy.
Jessica wants this all to be platonic.
Why bother with the damp body-tremble?
The bone-dry gut-sounds. The holy hand placed to cheek in the freeze, the movement static. The ear-bite beside the budding no-name flower.
Jessica’s eyes bloom wide with a dose of molly. Wider with a bong pull.
All the skinny noise leaves her breathless so she pulls and pulls, fakes a moan and pulls.
She is three-hundred fifty miles thinner.
I can carry her on a fishhook so I do.
Zombie References “God is Dead” to Justify Existence

i.
the first time she said hallelujah a dead dog fell from her mouth

I tried to bury the dog but it bit off my hand so I killed it again and thus she spoke it once more, hallelujah

ii.
I found a knife in my back pulled it out slowly so I could hear the metal grind from the sound I could tell it was serrated like a good knife should be

iii.
if Nietzsche was right then we were the ones created in God’s image

iv.
the dog’s rotting mass has me thinking about going back to church to drink the holy water
The Amalgam Attempting to Speak for the First Time

yeah. maybe. sometimes. they leave a fresh/pulled tooth in the microwave as a fair/well note yeah maybe some times
the toilet lid wants to speak while you piss sometimes maybe later, sometimes a mammoth is frozen like a Polaroid in ice sometimes the door jams carpet gets all dirty a finger’s print spirals on the mirror printer breaks then screams at you for abusing it abuse the system settings on a computer sum timez we staple freshly skinned furs to neighbors’ doors we shake hands until blisters fuse we Google Bill Murray maybeyeah sometime we talk to Bill Murray in our dreams about independent films becoming the ironic new main/stream yeah maybesometime we howl like closed windows in someone’s bathroom anyone/anyone our throats so full of plate glass when we speak we spread light sometimes we die in a hospital sometimes someone goes missing and all we find is a molar we’ve teeth enough for a denture(d) retirement yeah yeah yeah to the checklist of missing personas yes to the unruly child pounding his fists on the glass from the inside of a mason jar yes to the hip hop reference in the slip of a tongue yes to the howl of too many rogue scribes yes, please, thank you for your time yeah sometimes they shove you out the door into The Street (of Crocodiles) all asleep, that tension sometimes you refuse to attend the wake sometimes you visit a grave and still don’t die    sometimes the grave is empty    sometimes you carve an epitaph in the trunk of a tree just chopped

it is a perfect epitaph
yeahmaybesometimes
it is a perfect epitaph

to honor a dish sponge you threw out yesterday
The Scatter Brain’s Convalescence

I. Memory is a man’s back stiff from standing still.

IIa. They robbed the kitchen of my messes, all the shiny-bottle liquid spilt into stain on the carpet. Every bottle is a mess.
    b. with the kitchen went the mirrors
    c. I couldn’t see the the drugs, black wings, the sinking shoulder. The other shoulder below the watered surface.

iii. if YouTube gives you lemons you are now in possession of lemons. Film this:
    Cut them into slices and feed them to babies. Upload for wasted giggle.

iv. I am not stone
    I am not steel
    I am not statue frozen mid-question I am not hollow-tipped pistol I am not machismo
    I am not down-to-the-bit grisly. said my uncle before a social network ate him.

Va. My uncle says, her parents waited in the hall, firemen climbed a ladder to the ashtray on a table b. Fentanyl is a painkiller. Terminal patients often take it.
I shouldn’t know this. I shouldn’t know what a fentanyl lollipop is. A fentanyl patch. I threw away a box of them when I saw them in the cupboard.
    c. He says, her eyes were open, mouth too, a cigarette in one hand and a lighter in the other.

VI. He says, she (tree)barks like there’s food on the table.

    Carl said he would die when he was eighty and he did.
    Michael was a DJ. He is half-life. He is why Carl has yet to see his wife.
    Skylake Realty. Born in the 70s. Died in a recess[of]ion VIII. Tracey’s Diary. Undated entry. First day, final stay in rehab.

    “It’s another day in paradise.”
    Four months pass.
    “It’s just another fucking day in paradise.”
The Body: four patches.
The Stomach: one patch broken open.
The Autopsy: heart failure.
Buddy: You may only die of heart success.

IX. From the solstice, we recover From the blue-tipped highrise, we recover From our parents’ death, we recover Ash calls itself snow sometimes.

X. Titles: Glitter Tick(s), My Swagger, The Gun Jammed but I Still Ran like an Electric Cat Anyway, I Don’t Remember My Dreams, Patience Lost like Snake Skin, Skinning Snakes’ Skin, Cell Division and Limited Production and Formatted like Wall Paper.

X. Skin is a congregation of walls.

• The Flat Universe
To the queens who can’t keep their heads attached. To the flat-faced monsters we keep from hatching. Build me an ossified fortress from the remains of white stars—diamonds.

• The Closed Universe
A solemn dragon burns the air from a room.

• The Open Universe
Stretched into silence like ourselves when all small-talk has shed into silk.
Our eyes to a wall of worry. Skin taped to the dream where the body couldn’t stand the ghost falling like sand but the soul stuck in the taste of water.

I remember them mounting the marble tile locking her box in a spot no light could enter as if home was here as home was the center.
Now

(.) regarding you (is) (like) holding (a) lucid dream(s) Day may burn them Gone

(home) ... (home)

... (home) ...

.
...
..
The Anti-Apotheosis

I do not know who follows my mass or snaps at my static. Call 911. Call my grandma. Hold a plastic bag in a windstorm. Grandma’s jaw is soft. Grandma’s jaw is Jewish. It is still a jaw.
Call man with motor and drill-bit.
Spit in a pond by a boat.
Kill a duck with your brain and say sorry.
Roast it into crisp fowl until its skin turns to wafer.
Sing a song about ghosts and sinking ships on a camping trip. I can bring woman.
I can bring my body. I can play your part.
This part has you kissing your own lips against a bathroom mirror. Saliva and glass, DNA and passion, guts and groping. Tracks in sand say lost and stay in motion. Do not grow old. Do not let your grinding knee moan for transdermal patches.
Disbelief

I pull the skeins at the peak of your amber protein to find the place where we dream about animals with no eyes and too many teeth. The hum of wild washes clean impurity. Toddlers question us with full-throttle grin, open land into a mesh of forest, winding roots and burrow, wavering dirt and bug bite, slipping sunlight, art bark and bloom. Those who call our names swell and breathe without opines.

When chests heave with hunger, emptiness becomes communal sacrifice. When the roiling folds of valley-talk flatten into commitment and the blessed bless the best in us, I will hold you like a ball of neon light. You’ll bloom into a burst of energy. I will chrysalis shell harden and feed parts of myself to the parts of you that went missing when the light struck. We, as if dead, will rise like the split bone of home. Behind the front door, a platform for time to stretch and give us memory of parents that pulled apart to keep their children together, blood loose in a midnight ambulance, carriages made from finger and nail. Our families didn’t mean to disbelieve. The others didn’t mean to fall like leaves from branches that hang like the arms of famished children.

Reading List

Dickman, Michael. Flies. Port Townsend: Copper Canyon. 2011

